

Rhymes of the North

And
Other Rhymes

By JACK HACKETT

HR
PR9216
A14
R4

The coyotes howl
And the huskies growl
On the trail to the Arctic zone,
And the night owls hoot
And the rabbits scot,
While the pine trees groan and moan.

Price
75c.

For him was lever have at hys beddes heed
Twenty bokes, clad in blak or reed,
Of Aristotle and hys philosophye,
Than robes riche, or fithele, or gay gautrye.

Robie Lewis Reid

*The F. W. Howay and R. L. Reid
Collection of Canadiana
The University of British Columbia*

but

RHYMES OF THE NORTH

*and
Other Rhymes*

By

JOHN A. HACKETT

THE DIGGON PRESSES
VICTORIA B.C.

158,380

41

2012

2012

Copyright, Canada
1924
John A. Hackett

CONTENTS

My Northern Home	7
When the Northern Rivers Break	8
The King of the North	10
A Northern Dance	14
Dreaming of Boom Days	23
Varney	27
After the Boom	31
The Friendly Rivers	34
The Golden West	35
The Trapper's Friend	37
The Wealth of the North	39
Camps on the Winter Trail	40
Little-Go-Get-In	43
The Mounties	44
The Western Boob	46
Dreams on the Trail	49
Dreams	50
Who Knows?	52
When a Fellow's Up Against It	53
Let's Wander Back	54
Who is to Blame?	55
The Ladder That Leads to Perfection	57
Alone at the Old Homestead	58
Who Wins?	60
Darling, We Are Not Growing Old	63
Parson Jones	64
Be a Sport	66

MY NORTHERN HOME

Oh! Northern stretch of wilderness,
Rivers, lakes and streams,
From whence do you get your power
To haunt us in our dreams?

Is it your quiet murmuring
That calls us soft and low,
When we visit some foreign country
Of our childhood long ago?

The cities that we used to love
In days now long gone by,
Have lost their great attraction,
And for our Northern home we sigh.

We miss the cry of the night birds
From the branches of the pine,
And the rippling of the rivers,
And the lakes where the moonbeams shine.

And the grandest of all pictures
On the long, cold winter nights,
Is the cloudless, starlit heavens,
And the glorious Northern Lights.

And even the howl of the coyote
We hear o'er the city's noise,
And we long to be back to our home in the North,
And share in real nature's joys.

The people who live in the Old Land
Shudder at such a life,
But we've tried them both and are more content
Far away from the city strife.

WHEN THE NORTHERN RIVERS BREAK

I stood on the bank of the River Slave
At a post called Fort Fitzgerald,
And I thought of the miles of wilderness
Between me and the outside world.

The ice was solid for miles above,
And miles and miles below;
But the earth was bare, except here and there,
Were little patches of snow.

I had waited there for many days
Expecting the water to rise,
Then I looked up-stream, and my breath came quick—
I could scarcely believe my eyes.

It looked like a mountain rolling down,
Of water, ice and snow;
And I looked for a place of safety,
For the banks where I stood were low.

Then I climbed to a rock of granite
That stood by the river's bank,
And could plainly hear the rasp and roar
As the icebergs rose and sank.

And as I stood on that rock and watched,
The river appeared to me
To laugh at the blanket of ice that hid
Its race to the Arctic Sea.

For it broke its bonds with gigantic strength,
And shattered, like sheets of glass,
The fields of ice that had barred its way,
And refused to let it pass.

Then away like a race horse crazed with fear,
It raced on its northern course,
And each moment it seemed to gather speed
And increase its mighty force.

Then I turned my gaze up-stream again
To where, just a short time before
Lay fields of ice; there now appeared
Clear water from shore to shore.

And then, oh joy! around the bend
Came a steamer with flags unfurled;
And she looked to me like a phantom ship
From the other side of the world.

But I soon discovered on her forward flag,
The letters "H. B. C.,"
And I said to my self "Oh joy!" again,
For she sure looked good to me.

I had spent some time in the frozen North,
And slept beneath a tree:
It may suit people who love the wilds,
But it's too close to nature for me!

But I'm due to arrive in the outside world
Before many days are o'er,
And can safely say goodbye to the North,
For I'm coming back no more.

THE KING OF THE NORTH

Out in Northern Alberta,
Just this side of the Arctic line,
Dwell the most contented people
You will find in any clime.

They may talk of kings and princes,
And men of great renown,
Who are worrying o'er their losses,
And their fights to hold their crown.

Do you think they are as happy
Or as soundly satisfied
As this Northern brown-skinned hero,
With his family by his side?

He has no wish for riches,
Just enough to tide him o'er
From today until tomorrow,
He will ask for nothing more.

His home is on the hillside,
Close beside some rippling stream,
With the forest spread around him,
Life is one long pleasant dream.

In the winter in his cabin,
Or his teepee, or his shack,
He has stored his winter's ration,
And nothing does he lack.

Then he laces on his snow-shoes,
His hunting knife and gun,
And glides across the frozen snow
In search of game or fun.

If you watch him as he travels,
~~You will see he is intent~~
On arriving at a certain spot
Where small birch tree is bent.

And here you will see a dead-fall,
A spring trap, or a snare,
But unless he leads you to it,
You'd never know it was there.

And this is the beginning
Of a line for many miles,
Where traps are set at intervals,
By the streams and through the wilds.

He travels through the forest,
With his stalwart form erect,
With something of the feeling
Of a president-elect.

For he knows his traps were baited
With the choicest kind of bait,
But until his tramp is over
He does not know his fate.

But it's not so much for worldly game
Or what a silver fox will bring,
But to be the greatest hunter
At the trading post next spring.

For when the winter is over
And the traps are gathered in,
He packs his furs together,
Silver fox and beaver skin.

Then he takes his happy family,
Of which he loves to boast,
And guides them through the forest
To the nearest trading post.

And here he meets his oldtime friends
That he hasn't seen for years;
And renews the old acquaintance
Midst feasting, song and cheers.

And when the trading is over,
And the wife and little kids
Have received their summer's clothing,
From moccasins to lids,

They start upon a visit
To some nearby tribe of friends,
And are welcome to remain there
Until the summer ends.

Then back to winter quarters
To renew the old trap line,
With a firm determination
To be in the lead again this time.

You people of the cities,
 Who in costly mansions dwell,
 Do you think you are more contented
 Than this copper-colored swell?

Who never wronged a neighbor,
 And whose friends are true to him,
 And never feels an ache or pain
 In body or in limb.

I have heard some city people,
 With a long, sad mournful face,
 Pity those poor natives
 As an unhappy ignorant race.

Well, maybe they are ignorant
 Of a city's gilded wings,
 But if you were in the forest
 They could teach you many things.

And as far as being happy
 And contented is concerned,
 He surely has you beaten,
 For this lesson he has learned:

Don't worry about tomorrow,
 For my dinner's in the brook,
 I can secure it in a minute
 With a fishing line and hook.

So, when you feel a sore spot
 Pressing on your heart,
 And you feel you have neglected
 To do your little part

To help those ignorant natives
Become great and wise like you,
Just have your doctor examine your head:
Perchance he'll pull you through.

A NORTHERN DANCE

One dark, dark night
In a Northern town,
Not a soul was in sight—
Not even a sound.

A dim light flickered
In Barney's store,
And I watched for the pool room light
Next door.

Then came Yankee Bill
With a torch in his hand,
And lit a match
On the cider barrel stand.

And soon the room
Was flooded with light,
And the rolling of balls
Was on for the night.

I watched the game
For an hour or so,
For I was a stranger
With no place to go.

But just as the clock struck
 Half past ten,
 The door was entered
 By two young men,

With moccasins new
 And neckties red,
 And wide-brimmed hats
 On the back of their head.

They were the leading boys
 Of this half-breed town,
 And the rest of the bunch
 Soon gathered around.

And one of them said
 As he looked the bunch o'er,
 "Let's make a dance
 In the old drug store."

And, as if by magic,
 The cues were racked
 And the tables deserted,
 And the balls were stacked.

And the entire crew
 Filed out on the street,
 With silk trimmed gauntlets
 And moccasined feet.

"We must have a light,"
 Says one of the bunch,
 "A fiddling man,
 And a midnight lunch."

And I asked Old Bill
If I'd heard aright,
Were they arranging a dance
At that time of the night?

And he says, "My friend,
Just listen to me:
Walk down the street,
And you will see."

I took his advice,
And followed the crowd,
Directed by screeches
And war-whoops loud.

And as I reached
The old drug store,
A light was shining
Through the broken door.

And lo! and behold!
There came from within
The sound of a three-stringed Violin.

And I said to myself,
"No dance tonight,"
For there wasn't a dusky
Maid in sight.

And what about
That midnight lunch?
There wasn't six bits
In the entire bunch.

Then just behind me
 I heard a giggle,
 And surely I saw
 A dark object wiggle.

Yes, that was the first
 Of the maidens fair
 That came from the brush
 And everywhere.

And inside of a minute,
 I'll bet a cent,
 There were two little maidens
 For every gent.

And under their arms,
 In gorgeous array,
 Was a basket of lunch
 To be raffled away.

But, according to custom,
 The music began,
 And they tripped to the floor,
 Every maiden and man.

There was Isabel, Maggie,
 Julia and Kate,
 Liza and Janey,
 And Slim's running mate:

Already to balance,
 Sasha or swing,
 In fact, they were ready
 For most anything.

And the director,
With his arm around Jane,
Hollered, "Honor your partners!"
And corners the same.

All join hands
And circle to the right;
Gee! I was sure
There would be doings that night.

But smoothly things seemed To be running along,
Until little fat Julia
Felt something go wrong.

It all seemed to happen
In the ladies' sasha,
When one of her garters
Had carried away.

It wasn't the kind
That you buy in the town,
But a moccasin string
Wound round and round.

But all credit to Julia,
She did not despair,
She was on for that dance
And was bound to stay there.

Then ladies swing out
And gents swing in
But nobody noticed
That moccasin string.

But it dropped to the floor
As it slowly unwound,
Then that beastly director
Cried, "Swing 'em around!"

Then Slim gave his partner
A cute little swing,
And stood on the end
Of the moccasin string.

Then Julia went down
Like a colt that was roped,
And her partner was certain
His sweetheart was doped.

But she hauled in the string,
And she sat on the floor,
And wound it around
And tied it once more.

Then up on her feet,
Not worried at all,
And the director was shouting:
"Run away all."

Then Julia discovered
A chance to get in,
And tightly she wound
Her fat arms round slim.

Then grand right and left
With the girl over there,
And run away all,
To you know where.

Then, after the dancers
Had rested themselves;
The baskets were lifted
Down from the shelves.

And sold one by one
To the fellow who knew
Who packed in the lunch
In this basket of blue.

But two of those maidens
Had gave out the news
They had packed in their baskets
Two bottles of booze.

Well, bidding was tame
Till the auctioneer said:
"How much do I hear
For this basket of red?"

"Five and a half!"
"Oh! seven!" says Dick;
He had raised his own bid,
And he did it right quick.

The auctioneer tried
For four bits more,
And Dick hollered "Eight!"
And the bidding was o'er.

Then Dick grabbed the girl,
The basket and all,
And picked a quiet spot
At the rear of the hall.

Then into the basket,
With appetite strong,
And a thirst that had worried them
Ever so long.

But, after the eating
And drinking was o'er,
This girl from Grande Prairie
Was glued to the floor.

Oh! horrors of horrors!
And what a surprise,
To see this dusky maiden
Stewed to the eyes!

But she slowly recovered
And rose to her feet,
And made for the door
That led to the street.

But a red river jig
Was in progress just then,
And she jumped in and jigged
With a dozen young men.

But the effort was great,
And she slowly went down,
And sat on the floor,
While the walls spun around.

Then two of the boys
Who had known her before,
Picked her up bodily
And hit for the door.

And that was the last
Of poor Emma that night,
But the rest of them danced
Until after daylight.

But Dick stood and gazed,
With his brain in a whirl,
He still held the basket.
— But lost track of the girl.

Then he slowly departed
With Harry, his friend,
Who heard Dicky murmur,
“Never again!”

Then I buttoned my coat,
For the music had stopped;
The guests had departed,
The curtain had dropped.

“I have seen Barnum’s circus,
And the elephants prance,
But they’re not in the game
With this Northern dance.

And the night that I spent
At this Indian show,
Passed the time for a stranger
With no place to go.

DREAMING OF BOOM DAYS

I stood on the bridge at Grouard,
 With my back turned to the West;
 I was dreaming of nineteen-thirteen,
 When the town was at its best.

I dreamt I saw thousands of people
 Headed up this way,

And a dozen ocean steamers
 Laid at anchor in Hilward's Bay.

The passengers all had come ashore
 In order to make haste
 They were after Grouard real estate,
 And they had no time to waste.

And I thought a chap from Edmonton
 Came strolling up to me,
 And says: "My dear old fellow,
 You're the guy I've been wanting to see.

"I've heard you own some real estate,
 Both in and out of this town,
 And I want to purchase a bunch of it,
 And can pay the money down.

"I will give you two million dollars
 For half the lots you hold."
 And he asked me how I would have it—
 In paper or in gold.

I said I would take it in paper
 As it was lighter to carry around;
 And he dumped a bunch of greenbacks
 Beside me on the ground.

Then some foreign noise disturbed me,
Like the hooting of an owl,
Or the barking of a husky,
Or a coyote's mournful howl.

And my toes began to wiggle,
And my eyes were opened wide.
And I looked for the bunch of greenbacks
That had been lying by my side.

But they had surely disappeared,
And my head began to pain,
And I'd have given a million dollars
Just to fall asleep again.

And luck was surely with me,
For my head began to nod,
And I leaned against the rail of the bridge
And grasped a wooden rod.

When I got back to Slumberland,
And just began to snore,
That blooming bunch of greenbacks
Came sailing back once more.

And I thought my old friend Barney
Came and touched me on the arm, Saying: "Don't bother about those greenbacks, Jack,
They'll surely take no harm.

"For we all have barrels of money;
Just this afternoon I sold
Two or three of my back street lots
For a million pounds in gold."

Then I began to figure,
 For I had some town lots still,
 And I grabbed a paper and pencil
 And went at it with a will.

The figures amounted to billions,
 Not too much for Grouard land;
 And mine was close to Hughie Hunter's,
 Between Pete Tompkins and George Morand.

But I think this billion dollar stuff
 Had given my nerves a shock,
 For I jumped clean over the rail of the bridge,
 And landed on the dock.

I looked around for Barney,
 But he had vanished, too.
 And the only person near me
 Was little Skineque.

He said "Mewassin kesekow,"
 (Which means "good-day" in Cree),
 And stood upon one moccasin
 And calmly looked at me.

He said, "My dear old moneyou,
 You are a long way too far West,
 You had better get back to the East again,
 again,

Where the climate suits you best.

"Kea Namowya mewassin.
 Look up on yonder ridge,
 There we go to sleep in a teepee,
 But never down here on the bridge."

And as he pointed his finger,
I looked against my will,
And I saw an old log cabin
And a teepee on the hill.

One look and I was back to earth,
But I can tell you what it means
To be a millionaire in Grouard.
And have it vanish in a dream.

But we have one consolation:
Grouard is not the only town
Where the people lost their money
Or were fleeced both up and down.

For we know a bunch of suckers
In a town up on the Peace,
Who spent a million dollars
Digging holes for axle grease.

The oil has not developed,
It slipped down to the North Pole,
And the suckers' only dividend
Is a snapshot of the hole.

Some invested on Tar Island,
And some close in, it seems,
But they have not received a dollar back,
Not even in their dreams.

VARNEY.

Who came from Sweden when a boy
And landed in New York or Troy,
Then hit the trail for Illenoy?
Varney!

Who, in the year of ninety-eight,
Was told about the Golden Gate
And hit for Klondyke with his mate?
Varney!

But on the way he hit a snag,
For some one stole his money bag,
And he was forced behind to lag,
And never got there.

But Varney never did despair,
He speared a meal both here and there,
And when he rode he beat his fare,
And never thanked them.

He rose each morning with the sun
And made his way to Edmonton,
But left again upon the run
For Athabasca Landing.

Well, there he labored for a-while,
When things were good you'd see him smile,
But when they were bad his blood would rile,
And he would damn the country.

The winter time was coming on,
And Varney had no clothes to don,
His hob-nailed shoes were nearly gone,
But he was gritty.

He slept in Izaac Ganneau's shack,
The snow was blowing through the crack,
But Varney snored upon the rack,
And let her whistle.

He met a chap from near Slave Lake,
Who told him there was coin to make
If he had nerve to undertake
To walk-to-Grouard.

Well, Varney had the nerve alright,
So he packed his kit and flew his kite,
And by evening he was out of sight,
Up the icy river.

As he hiked along the frozen track
With a blacksmith's shop upon his back
And a jackfish froze in a gunny sack,
He soon got weary.

So he camped with old Jack Knife that night,
And ate his lunch by candle light,
And stowed the jackfish out of sight,
And the gunny sack was empty.

He hit the trail when daylight came,
His feet were sore and he was lame,
But Varney stuck and played the game,
And landed safe in Grouard.

He rented some old-timer's shack,
And unstrapped the forge from off his back,
And split the empty gunny-sack
And made an apron.

And there he pounded horse-shoe nails,
And mended stoves and pans and pails,
And lived on moose and beaver tails,
Just like the natives.

And soon he learnt to talk their tongue,
He learnt it quick, for he was young;
And many an Indian song was sung
While Varney listened.

But Varney was the roving kind,
And Grouard soon he left behind,
And went to see what he could find
At a village on Peace River.

But this was just as bad, or worse,
And Varney pinched his empty purse,
And scratched his head and tried to curse
In English.

But he got a job and took it quick,
And split some rails for Allie Brick,
But he hit his foot an awful lick,
And nearly cut his toe off.

Then back to Grouard Varney came,
And swore that he would make a name,
No matter how the money came,
He'd get it.

First he built a small steamboat,
But he couldn't get the thing to float,
And it nearly got poor Varney's goat,
So he sunk her.

Then he opened up a little store,
With a pane of glass and home-made door,
And sat a pool table on the floor,
And hopped to it.

Now, Varney never played much pool,
But, just the same, he was no fool:
His aim was straight, his head was cool,
And he always got the ten ball.

The cash came in both fast and quick,
And Varney had his choice and pick
Of all the land, from Sucked Creek
To Grouard.

Well, day by day the business grew,
The freighting teams were passing through,
And Varney took another chew
Of Copenhagen.

When Varney's business grew so large,
He didn't know just what to charge
For a bully beef or olemarge,
He charged the limit.

But all the same he got the biz,
And it surely was no fault of his
If Isabelle or little Liz
Didn't spend their money.

Then he built a larger store,
His business growing more and more;
Then into real estate he tore,
And made a boodle.

Then he was elected mayor,
And stuck right to that honored chair.
'Till Grouard didn't seem to care
If she had a mayor and council.

Well, Varney's still sitting tight,
And holding on with all his might,
Money is scarce and sales are light.
But you never hear him whimper.

AFTER THE BOOM

I wonder what's the reason
That I have such funny dreams
About the bridge in Grouard?
I can't figure what it means.

Sometime ago I had a dream
About the days gone by Way back in nineteen-thirteen,
When things were flying high.

But I had another dream last night,
And as it seemed to me,
'Twas ten years in the future,
But as far as I could see,

There was no bridge at Grouard,
Nor no Grouard at the bridge,
Not even that old teepee
Standing on the ridge.

But I waded in the water
Where the old bridge used to stand,
And met a mammoth jackfish
Looking for a place to land.

And to my surprise, he murmured,
As he wiggled on the shore:
"You may think I'm just a jackfish,
But I've seen you here before.

"In nineteen-twelve and thirteen
I was not a jackfish then,
But just a common sucker,
Like the other bunch of men

"Who dabbled in this townsite
And thought they had the earth,
And would not sell their holdings
For many times their worth.

"You see that bunch of willows
A short way up the shore?
Well, that's the spot where Varney built
His departmental store.

"And here and there you see a spot
Where the willow doesn't grow,
Well, that's the place the moonshine
Was buried in the snow".

And then this strange old jackfish
Began to roll and flop,
And laugh so loud and hearty
I thought he'd never stop.

But when he finally settled,
He spread his fins out wide
And asked me to come closer—
He had something to confide.

"You will wonder why I'm laughing,
As if at some funny joke;
Well, you are the joke I am laughing at:
You've stayed here till you're broke.

"But you are not the only one,
There are others did the same,
They came here with their heads swelled,
But went out mighty tame.

"But now I must be going,
For the bay is fine and calm,
But before I go I'll tell you
Why you see me as I am.

"Before I was a jackfish,
I was a sucker, as you know,
And got stranded here in Grouard,
With no place else to go—

"Except up to Peace River,
Where the other suckers went,
But suckers must have money,
I didn't have a cent.

"But the lake was frozen over,
And I hit for Sucker Creek;
But I walked into an air hole,
And the jackfish got me quick.

"And since then I've resided
In this old jackfish shell,
Sliding through the rushes.
And I think it's just as well.

"That no one sees the sucker
Who bought in Grandview Heights,
Where fire-flies are shining still,
And not electric lights."

Then he says: "Goodbye, old fellow!
Out here is not my place."
So he slid into the water,
And splashed some in my face.

Then I woke up and rubbed my eyes,
One look, and then I knew
That Grouard had been hoodooed,
My dream would sure come true.

THE FRIENDLY RIVERS

Through Northern woods and inland lakes,
And among the hills and mountains high,
The rivers their well-bent pathway take,
And play with the islands as they pass by.

And even the banks by the river side
Come in for a share of their frolic and fun,
As they grasp the pine trees and ask them to ride
To the glorious land of the midnight sun.

And as they travel in friendly style,
 The pine trees floating with graceful ease,
 The river murmurs once in a-while:
 "When you're tired riding, just stop when you please."

You may pick your spot and rest for a spell:
 And we'll land you there without adieu,
 And we'll pick you up when the waters swell,
 And the ice in the Spring is passing through.

We've watched them carry their passengers on
 To some quiet spot where the landing was good;
 And we've watched in the Spring when the ice was gone,
 They had done their work, as they promised they would.

THE GOLDEN WEST

When daylight fades, and evening closes
 O'er the western hills and plains,
 And the bluebells and wild roses
 Close their petals once again:

And the night birds in the branches
 Pipe their songs, some soft, some shrill,
 And we hear from nearby ranches
 Cattle low, and all is still,

We feel at peace with all creation,
Nothing lacking we require,
All our faith is in our nation,
Her success is our desire.

We look with pride on all the changes
Made since we first landed here;
Railroads span the miles of ranges,
Towns and cities far and near.

Wheat is ripening in many sections,
All around us, far and wide,
Cattle graze in all directions,
Health and plenty side by side.

Why should we be filled with worry,
Just because the winter's near?
Rest at ease; don't fret nor worry;
Luck is with us, never fear.

We are favored in this country
Far more so than others are;
We can thank the chance that placed us
Underneath a lucky star.

THE TRAPPERS' FRIEND

They talk of lonely places
In the far off northern wilds.
Where people live like hermits,
And no one ever smiles.

Where men with wild set faces
Are roaming at their will,
Hiding in silent places,
Watching their chance to kill.

And other foolish stories
By people who don't know
That the loneliest place is a city
Where thousands come and go.

I have talked to the Northern trapper,
And men who have spent their lives
Hunting for hidden treasure
By the streams and through mountain dives.

And they told me surprising stories
Of the pleasure that they take
In their camp on the bank of a river,
Or beside some inland lake.

And I asked if they ever felt lonely
For the friends they left behind,
And they showed me the spruce and pine trees,
Saying: "Those are friends of mine."

No one can ever be lonely
With friends as staunch as they,
Who spread their branches o'er me
And shelter me night and day.

And they tell me the rarest stories,
The rarest that ever were told,
Of men they had sheltered in days gone by
And protected them from the cold.

They tell of the hardened old-timer,
Who knew the Northern game,
And the boy who left his home in the East
In search of wealth and fame.

And they say that the most discouraged
Who say they will never come back,
Have returned to the North each winter,
And are seen on the beaten track.

There is some unseen attraction
That makes you feel at home
While under a tree in your blankets,
Watching the starlight/dome.

THE WEALTH OF THE NORTH

Can anyone guess the wealth that's stored
Down near the Arctic line,
Where Nature guards her golden horde,
But divulges from time to time.

In ninety-eight the Golden Gate,
To Alaska's ice-bound shore,
Was opened wide to the human tide,
With a maddening rush and roar.

And beneath the soil there are lakes of oil,
And silver and copper ore,
And zinc and lead in their granite bed,
Along each wild lake shore.

Few people know that if they should search
Along each lake and stream,
In many a hill and rippling rill,
They could satisfy their dream.

For the wealth is there for all to share,
And if each one does his part,
In years to come great mills will hum
In what now is the forest's heart.

CAMPS ON THE WINTER TRAIL

On a winter's day on a northern river Where not many white men had travelled before,
We plodded along, but the frost made us shyer,
And we asked the Cree driver "How many miles more?"

"Oh, maybe a lot, and maybe not many,
But the camp she come to us after a-while;
And when we get near it, it's not so much distance,
Maybe a short way or maybe a mile."

Then little was said, but the dogs kept on mushing,
And all of us thought that the trail had no end;
And through our minds one question was rushing—
"Will we find that old camp ground around the next bend?"

The day was most spent and the night was fast falling,
And many a bend in the river passed by;
The owls they were hooting, the coyotes were calling,
And the stars they were shining far up in the sky.

Then to our ears came the sound of a fiddle,
And a dim light appeared in a log cabin door:

And we all stood and tried to work out the riddle,

As some one in English cried "Right, and left four!"

We ventured inside and, to our amazement,
All the floor space was covered with feet;
You never did see such a funny arrangement,
All it needed was moonshine to make it complete.

There were Indian maids in their pink and blue dresses,

And Indian braves decorated with beads;
To tell where they came from you'd need many guesses,
But it must have been near where the cariboo feeds.

They paid no attention to us as we entered
But hit the high spots in "Run away all,"
For their hearts and their minds on the dancing were centered,
And the old people stood with their backs to the wall.

Such funny expressions were seen on their faces
As they balanced and swung to the fiddler's tune;

They were eager as schoolboys attending the races,

Or watching a total eclipse of the moon.

Then there appeared on the floor in the centre,
An Indian brave and his maiden in blue,
And a Red River jig, where each one could enter,

Was danced to the tune of "Biddy Be True."

They all took a turn, the young and the older,
And each one tried his partner to beat:
And every moment the maidens grew bolder,
And kicked up the dust with their moccas-sined feet.

They danced until morning, but we had forgotten

That we had been tired, and hungry, and cold.

And the time had arrived that our dogs should be trotting,

So into our carriage blankets we rolled.

Such is the life in that far Northern climate,

And many a traveller has had a surprise:

There's so much you discover, it's hard for to rhyme it.

And you could never untangle the family ties.

LITTLE-GO-GET-IN

In the heart of the wilds lives an Indian maid,
Who is known as "Little-Go-Get-In,"
She is lovely and brave, but she will not behave,
Nor abide by the laws as they're written.

She laughed at her friends who tried to advise
And tell her how tall she was gettin',
And how the young pale-face admired her eyes,
And her form while she's standin' or sittin'.

She turned a deaf ear to the Indian braves
Who came to make love and adore her,
And said "Nothing doing! You may be my slaves,
But you will never be anything further."

So she married the pale-face, and after a-while
She found he had vanished and left her,
But she tossed her head and said with a smile:
"He's just number one, and a starter."

She's had several since, and of different kinds,
They would stick if she would permit 'em,
But she tells them there's nothing between them that binds,
When she wants them she'll go-get-em.

Little-Go-Get-In, Little-Go-Get-In,
She can whistle, or purr like a kitten,
If she does wear a frown and her skin is dark brown,
She's a peach, whether standing or sittin'.

THE MOUNTIES

We have all read thrilling stories.
Of the West and Western life,
Of the men who broke the forest trail
Through suffering, storm and strife.

Of the rustlers on the prairie,
And the wild men from the woods,
And the men who went to Klondyke
And returned without the goods.

But there's many deeds of bravery
Where the story is never told,
Of the chap who wears the red coat,
And his trousers striped with gold.

Those men who guard the rivers,
The forest and the hill,
And never fail to capture
The man who shoots to kill.

They are known as Royal Canadian now,
Instead of Royal North West;
It may sound good in many parts,
But the old name suited best.

For they've made this western country
A real safe place to live,
And never shirked their duty,
But gave the best they had to give.

And many a weary traveller
Has been cheered along his way,
For he was protected
From the human bird of prey.

And through miles and miles of wilderness
 They have travelled all alone,
 To enforce law and order
 And protect the settler's home.

To see them in the cities,
 Or in some western town,
 You'd think they lived on Easy Street,
 With roses strewn around.

But follow this bold mounty
 When the officer in charge
 Has ordered him to capture
 Some criminal at large.

He would lead you through the forest
 Until you're satisfied
 He has earned his reputation,
 Both as officer and guide.

If a river is low he will ford it,
 Or swim it if it is high;
 He has sworn to do his duty—
 He will get this man or die.

And when he makes the capture
 Of this outlaw in his den,
 He shows his human feelings,
 For he's a man with men.

And you will always hear real bad men,
 And men whose crimes are small,
 Speak well of the Mounted Policemen,
 And respect them one and all.

THE WESTERN BOOB

Among the funny sights you see
While travelling through the West,
Is the chap just fresh from the eastern town
Lodging his first protest.

He left his home in Ontario,
Or some place away down there,
With a firm determination
Some western boob to snare.

He said "Just watch me get them,
They will not be on to my game,
And I'll get their dough before they know
Who I am or from whence I came.

But the western boob was waiting,
Had waited many a day,
For just such a golden guinea
To float around his way.

While the chap from the East was waiting
For some easy mark to land;
The boob from the West came strolling up
And grabbed him by the hand.

Saying, "Hello! my dear old fellow!
Haven't I met you somewhere before?
Let me see: was it down in Ontario,
Or was it in Baltimore?

"Your face is surely familiar,
But I can not recall your name,
But if you're from the East, you class A,
And know how to play the game.

"We need such chaps as you out here
To help us push ahead,
For most of the men who live in the West
Seem to be mentally dead."

The eastern chap was flattered,
He was taking the bait with ease,
While puffing a "Quebec Special,"
And blowing the smoke to the breeze.

He smiled to himself with pleasure,
And winked at himself with glee,
Saying "This is the chap I've been looking for,

Who thinks that this is me.

"I will let him think that he knows me
And make him believe I'm his friend,
And after I have him buncoed
He'll know who I am in the end."

So he slapped the boob on the shoulder,
And asked for a chance to invest
In some of the best propositions
That were floating out here in the West.

Then into a real estate office
In a prominent place in the street,
With a map of the West in the window
And a townsite where all railroads meet.

And here in a little back office,
Where the king of the boobs had his den,
In a big leather chair with his feet in the air,
And his ear held a gold-pointed pen.

He looked such an innocent creature,
He would hand out his coin on request,
Or would give you a chance in a million,
If you had the brains to invest.

The eastern gūy was bewildered,
As the king of the boobs showed him how
He could clear up a million of money,
If he invested in real estate now.

It didn't take long for to land him
In the townsite where all railroads meet,
Where the street cars were running at random,
For they hadn't yet opened the street.

And then to inspect his investment,
The easterner wended his way,
But he found that the block he had purchased
Was somewhere in Buffalo Bay.

Then back to this western city
To land Mr. Boob in the quay,
Or make him return his investment,
He wouldn't use him for a jay.

But he found that the office was vacant,
The boobs had moved out of town,
He inquired in every direction,
But not a trace of the boobs could be found.

And then he appealed to His Worship,
Who had much advice to suggest,
And this is the place that I left him,
Making his sad protest.

DREAMS ON THE TRAIL

We camped all night in a northern swamp,
On a river's bank among the spruce,
As we watched the sparks and shadows romp,
We heard the honk of a lone wild goose.

And Billy Hayes, the engineer
From way down East where the taters grow,
Was sure he saw a jumping deer
Pass in the darkness to and fro.

And Captain Deacon, he was there
With his blankets wound round him tight,
He was sure he saw a grizzly bear
Pass our camp some time in the night.

And I was sure as I could be
That before I covered up my head
I saw a wild cat up a tree
With his green eyes fixed on my spruce bough bed.

Then Jock Cunningham rubbed his nose
And sat up straight with a firm set jaw,
Then he hollered: "There he goes,
That's the largest moose I ever saw."

When daylight came we all arose
And wiped the cinders from our eyes,
And stretched our limbs and donned our clothes
But no one showed the least surprise.

Then all hands laughed as at some joke,
And Billy Hayes turned deathly pale,
And said that deer I saw last night
Wore a Stetson hat and a monstrous tail.

Then John Batese, the Indian guide,
With a face like a slab of hickory bark,
Says, "How you fellows sleep last night?
You make funny noise all time in the dark."

But no one answered John Batese,
And all of us thought that the better way
To forget our dreams and depart in peace
Was to hit the trail and have nothing to say.

DREAMS

It's strange the sort of nonsense
Goes racing through your head
While stretched for peaceful slumber
On your little downy bed.

But it isn't always nonsense,
For sometimes your dreams come true,
Or you wander back to by-gone days
With the old-time western crew,

When men of courage hit the trail
And faced the biting frost,
And helped each other up the hill,
No matter what it cost.

When we have dreams of those old days,
 When all was give and take,
 We want to fall asleep again,
 If we should chance to wake.

There was no class distinction then,
 No special privilege shown,
 And each one felt the other's loss
 Was equal to his own.

But when we dream of present days,
 It makes a fellow snore;
 We try to wake and long to place
 Our feet upon the floor.

And when we fully realize
 Our dream was based on facts,
 If we could sleep and never dream,
 We'd sleep on carpet tacks.

I wonder what's the reason
 Some people that you meet
 Don't seem to have the old-time pep
 While walking down the street.

There is surely something missing,
 But we'll find it soon, I hope,
 When we banish prohibition
 That prohibits all but dope.

WHO KNOWS?

I watched the sun the other eve
As it sunk o'er Sunset Bay,
And its parting rays announced to me
The close of another day.

I thought of the many heart aches,
Poor souls on earth had borne
While the sun was travelling westward,
Since it rose in the east that morn.

And I thought of the many places
Where joy and gladness reigned,
Where the day before was sadness,
And hands and feet had changed.

And as the shadows faded,
And slowly sank from sight,
I thought of the many changes
Ere they returned with heat and light.

How many homes would be mourning
Dear friends who had passed away,
Who had been with them in the evening
When the sunset closed the day.

And I thought of the little children
Who would arrive on earth that night,
To gladden some home that was lonely,
And turn many dark spots light.

This world is not all sorrow,
There is pleasure here as well,
But which we get on the morrow,
Not one of us can tell.

For there are many things that may happen
 In the hours from dawn to dawn,
 That will change the course of a life-time.
 But who knows till the day is gone?

WHEN A FELLOW'S UP AGAINST IT

When a fellow's up against it
 And his nerves are out of whack,
 And he feels himself a-slipping
 And a-sliding down the track,

And he asks a little favor
 Of his friend of better days.
 It is fun to see him wiggle
 In a hundred different ways.

He will tell you hard-luck stories
 And just how his hands are tied,
 And he hasn't been so hard-up
 Since his Uncle Reuben died;

And he's always in a hurry—
 Pressing business on his mind;
 He can not spare a moment,
 His work is all behind.

He knows you don't believe him,
 But he doesn't care a sou.
 And you have no right to blame him
 For not looking out for you.

If we trust to other people
To straighten our affairs,
We'll never leave the landing
At the bottom of the stairs.

Of course, there's many people
Who will help you in a way,
And will offer you a mansion
That's not built of mud and clay;

But they can't produce the title,
It's held for you in trust,
You will get it when you shuffle off
This little ball of dust.

But I know some pious people,
Just as well as other guys,
Who are taking lots of chances
On those mansions in the skies.

They may be straight and honest,
But some of them, I fear,
Would change a mansion in the sky
For a damn small cottage here.

LET'S WANDER BACK

Let us stop for awhile and wander back
To the days when we thought we knew it all,
And we'll find that many things we lacked,
And we knew very little, if any at all.

We thought that the parents that brought us up
 Were very much lacking in wordly wise,
 But we would capture the golden cup,
 And build a castle up to the skies.

Well, year by year we worried along,
 Always expecting the next would bring
 Riches and pleasure, music and song,
 Or something that would happen to make us a king.

But still we are here in the same old place,
 Striving to keep the wolf from the door,
 And poverty stares us square in the face;
 We must keep digging, then dig some more.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

You talk to the man who has made his pile,
 And started with fifty cents,
 You will notice his blood begins to boil
 When you mention some hard-up gents.

He'll tell you it's just the lack of brains
 That keeps a poor man poor,
 And tell you just how he placed his gains,
 And made his fortune sure.

But many have tried to play the game
 With a firm determined will,
 And finished their lives both tired and lame,
 And poverty with them still.

Some people will tell you that luck alone
Will bring a man to the front:
And others will tell you that muscle and bone
Will do the little stunt.

The man who has made millions of gold
In a measly miserly way,
Has left someone out in the cold,
Just who, it is hard to say.

But you'll generally find, if you look behind
The curtain that covers life,
The ones who have missed the best, you'll find,
Were himself, his children and wife.

You never can tell just where you will end,
Nor just what lies ahead:
And your luck may break, or only bend
From the start until you are dead.

You have noticed men who have started small,
Climb to the top with ease,
And the rich man's son who has spent it all
Now a drone in this hive of bees.

Or, maybe you've noticed a poor man's son
Remain as poor as his dad:
He has fought hard battles, but never won,
And he's neither sorry nor glad.

Then how are we going to figure it out
And tell just who's to blame?
Is it mere luck, without a doubt,
Or something without a name?

THE LADDER THAT LEADS TO PERFECTION

Does anyone stop when he gets to the top
Of the ladder that leads to perfection.
Or does he lean over and then take a flop
And start off in another direction?

When the years are ahead things look rosy and red,

And we start at the foot of the ladder,
But near the last rung many lose their head
And land below wiser and sadder.

But why should we worry or get in a hurry
To reach that topmost rung?
For while we are striving, intent on arriving,
We miss many songs that are sung.

We miss all the pleasure, for we haven't had leisure,

Nor the money to spend at the time;
But as we grow older our natures grow colder,
And it wrecks us to part with a dime.

The habit grows stronger, the ladder grows longer,

And each year it is harder to climb,
For the greater your hoard, the less you can afford

To spend either money or time.

The thing called success often make a great mess

Of a life that would have happier been,
If they'd been contented, and firmly resented
The habit of miserly mean.

Just follow the chap who is waving his cap,
And expects all the world to adore him;
You often will find he has things on his mind
That sooner or later will floor him.

But don't you forget it, you will never regret it,
If you stopped in the thick of a rush
To help some poor neighbor to lighten his labour,

Or some chap that the world tried to crush.

Let us look the world over through thistles and clover,

If you figure it out you will find
They all take a flop ere they get to the top,
Or land in a mess of some kind.

ALONE AT THE OLD HOMESTEAD

Did you ever watch the sun go down,
When your heart was filled with joy,
When you lived content at the old home,
When you were but a boy?

The ones you loved were with you,
And no dearer spot on earth
Could be found than the little cabin
With the old-time songs and mirth.

But the years have passed since those days,
 Old friends have gone to rest,
 And you sit and watch the sunset
 In the same old golden west.

But oh! the different feeling,
 From your heart all joy has flown,
 And all you have left is a memory,
 As you sit and watch alone.

Is there any spot more lonely
 Than the place you once loved well,
 When the old-time folks were with you,
 While you roamed o'er hill and dell.

The hills are there as in days gone by,
 And the fields are just as green,
 But the ones you loved have left you,
 And have changed the entire scene.

You sit and watch the sunset
 Through eyes bedimmed with tears,
 And no one knows how your heart aches,
 As you sigh for the by-gone years.

WHO WINS?

Who wins the hurly burly race
That all the earth has entered?
Is it the chap whose entire thoughts
On gold alone are centred?

Or is it he whose mind is set
To fill some high position,
And by hook or crook he mounts aloft
And reaches his ambition?

Or is it he who plods along
And takes things as he finds them,
And never thinks of future days,
Or the days he left behind him?

You can not tell by looking on
Just how a fellow's feeling,
For he must appear to be content
When he often feels like squealing.

While walking down a busy street,
You see some queer expressions,
And the chap that's taking stock of you
May have the same impressions.

But no one thinks the joke's on him,
There's no chance for criticism;
There's no mistake where we're concerned—
It's all self-magnetism.

Just take a look at the notorious crook
Who is always out for plunder,
He appears A-1, and has the look
Of a saint from over yonder.

Yet everyone has got their string,
And must learn how to pull it;
And some still have that honor thing,
And some have rashly sold it..

It's hard to say just which one wins,
For life is such a riddle,
But half the world must dance a jig,
And the other play the fiddle.

THE SONGS THAT DADDY SANG

How well we love the old-time songs
That Daddy used to sing,
While he poked the fire with tongs,
He would make the rafters ring.

Way down upon the Swanee River,
Far, far away,
There's a gentle voice that calls me ever,
Just at the break of day.

Maxwellton's braes are bonnie
Where early fa's the dew,
'Twas there that Sambo met his honey,
In her robe of pale sky blue.

Ye banks and braes of bonnie Doonè,
Why can ye bloom sa fresh and fair,
Beneath the silent, silvery moon,
And cast your shadows everywhere.

Darling, I am growing old,
No one seems to care for me;
Don't leave your honey in the cold,
But take me hame to bide with thee.

Wear a rose of white when you sing tonight,
For, honey, I'll be there;
And when the moon is shining bright,
I'll meet you, Molly, at the fair.

Gone are the days
When my heart was young and gay,
I'm not so young as I used to be
For my hair is turning gray.

Oh! don't you remember sweet Alice Ben Bolt,
With a voice like a silvery bell?
When you asked for a drink she would give you a jolt
From the old oaken bucket that hung in the well.

I long to hear that song again
In the shadow of the pine,
Close to the fields of sugar cane,
In the days of Auld Lang Syne.

Take me back to Tennessee,
Where Old Black Joe was born;
Beneath the shade of the apple tree
Among the sugar cane and corn.

And many were the songs he sang
While mother lulled to rest,
The little chap whose curly head
Was leaning on her breast.

DARLING, WE ARE NOT GROWING OLD

Darling, we're not growing old.

'Tis just the years that's passing by;
The story that has oft been told
Is just the same to you and I.

The spring time rose has left your cheek,
But the autumn rose is there,
Blooming bright, and seems to speak,
Casting sunbeams everywhere.

Tho' your hair is silver white,
'Tis fairer far than locks of gold;
And if your eyes are not so bright,
They a grand life's story hold.

I would not ask the days return
When golden ringlets graced your brow,
And wait the pleasure I have earned,
To see you as I see you now.

When at last we're laid at rest,
This simple story may be told
On the stone above our breasts:
Always young, but never old.

PARSON JONES

Parson Jones' congregation
Dwindled down to just a few,
And he was filled with consternation,
Scarcely knowing what to do.

And then he thought of Elder Bower,
Who had brains, and skill, and tact;
And he knew in half an hour
He could bring the wanderers back.

So he asked the Elder plainly
Just what course would be the best;
And the Elder answered, "Mainly,
Let prohibition have a rest.

"No one wants to hear you preaching
Prohibition and such trash;
What they want is honest teaching,
Liberty, and not the lash.

"All the people won't be driven
Into thinking what you think,
That they'll never be forgiven
If they drink a healthy drink.

"When you preach on Sunday morning,
Don't predict the Nation's fall
If they do not heed your warning;
That old stuff don't go at all.

"Then you preach on Sunday Closing
Of the playgrounds, parks, and such;
Don't you think that you're imposing
On the people rather much?

"You have all the week to ramble
Through the parks, or where you will,
But your neighbor—he must scramble
For cash to pay the grocery bill.

He scarce had time to eat his dinner,
Through the six days of the week,
Then you tell him he's a sinner
If Sunday pleasure he should seek.

"Join the League, my dear old brother!
Preach for freedom, plump and plain;
Then we'll gather, all together,
In your little church again."

BE A SPORT

Don't bow your head and lose your nerve
Because you have left fifty years behind;
Remember, you still have time to serve,
And can win out, if you have a mind.

Don't think because you hit it hard,
That nothing you touch will turn out right;
Just hit it again and play your card,
It may not win, but still it might.

You never know just what's ahead,
So bow your neck and throw out your chest;
You're liable to roll in a downy bed,
So take a chance along with the rest.

You haven't had your last chance yet,
There is always a chance till the light goes out;
So pick a winner and place your bet,
And show the world you're a good old scout.

THE END